THE Runic character ᛁ for this vowel was named ís:—Ís byþ oferceald ungemetum slídor; glisnaþ glæshluttur gimmum gelícust, Runic pm. Kmbl. p. 341.

The short i generally corresponds to Gothic i, e. g. in, Goth. in, biddan, Goth. bidjan; the long i, which is sometimes written ii, e. g. ríiknæ on the Ruthwell Cross, to Gothic ei, e. g. ísern, Goth. eisarn, bídan, Gothic beidan. In early West Saxon MSS., however, i, í are found arising from other sources. Thus the mutation of the breaking ea is written i, e. g. ildu, irmþu from eald, earm; and the mutations of eó, eá are written i, e. g. onlihtan, hiran. In such cases, however, instead of i the diphthong ie is very often found; and not only in such, but also in those where the root-vowel is i or í, e. g. ongietan, wietan [=witan]; even in the place of ý, e. g. iedegende. In the later MSS. instead of i or ie, y is found very commonly; indeed even in the earlier MSS. y has in some instances already made its way into the place of i, thus ryht is the form regularly used in Alfred's translation of Gregory's Pastoral Care. In the case of niht in the earliest times, in that of miht and its compounds in later, i takes the place of original a.

Initial i before a, o, u is there where most generally ge is used; for examples see below.

infangeneþeóf 'the right to judge one's own thief when taken within the jurisdiction, and the privilege consequent upon that jurisdiction, viz. the receiving of the mulct, or money-payment for the crime,' Cod. Dipl. Kmbl. i. xlv. The word, which does not occur in the earlier laws, is thus defined in those of Edward the Confessor:—Ðe infangeneþef. Justicia cognoscentis latronis sua est de homine suo, si captus fuerit super terram suam, L. Ed. C. 22; Th. i. 452, 4. In the preceding chapter, 'descripcio libertatum diversarum,' it is said the lords 'haberent eos [their men who had committed crime] ad rectum in curia sua, si haberent sachatn et socham, tol et theam, et infangene thef.' Other passages in which the word is found are L. Wil. I. 2; Th. i. 467, 27, Si quis eorum, qui habent soche et sache et tol et them et infangene theof, implacitetur in comitatu; and L. H. xx. c; Th. i. 528, 9, Archiepiscopi, episcopi, comites, et alie potestates in terris proprie potestatis sue sacam et socnam habent tol et theam et infongentheaf. The word also occurs in the following charters of Edward the Confessor:—Concedo eis in omnibus terris suis prænominatis, consuetudines hic Anglice scriptas, scilicet, infangene þeóf, etc. Chart. Th. 359, 3. A similar enumeration occurs in 384, 25 and in 411, 32. In 369, 13 the word occurs in an Anglo-Saxon charter. See also Cod. Dipl. Kmbl. iv. 227, 9, where is the form 'mid infangenum þeófe.'

-ing a suffix of feminine nouns denoting action.

-ing. I. a patronymic suffix:—Sume naman syndon patronymica, dæt synd fæderlice naman, æfter Grēciscum þeáwe, ac seó Lēdenspræc næfþ ða naman; hī sind swā ðeáh on Engliscre spræce, Penda, and of ðam Pending, Ælfc. Gr. 5; Som. 4, 52–4. Ælfrēd Æþelwulfing Alfred the son of Ethelwulf, Chr. 871; Erl. 76, 3. The use of this suffix is well shown by the genealogies in the Chronicle, e. g. pref; Erl. pp. 2, 4; 835; Erl. 68, 69, with which may be compared similar lists in Icelandic where -son is used. See also Lk. Skt. Lind. 3, 23–38 where the suffix is used with the foreign names, e. g. Seth Adaming Seth son of Adam. In a rather extended sense the suffix is found in the names of families or peoples, who are regarded as descendants of a common ancestor, and traces of this use remain in many place-names in England. 'The Wælsings, in Old Norse Völsungar, reappear at Walsingham in Norfolk, Wolsingham in Northumberland, and Woolsingham in Durham. The Billings at Billing, Billingham, Billinghoe, etc. Such local names are for the most part irregular compositions, of which the former part is the patronymic -ing, declined in the genitive plural. The second portion is a mere definition of the locality, as -geat, -hyrst, -hām, -wīc, -tūn, -stede, and the like. In a few cases the patronymic stands alone in the nominative plural, as Tōtingas, Tooting, Surrey; Wōcingas, Woking, Surrey; Meallingas, Malling, Kent. . . . In dealing, however, with these names, some amount of caution is necessary: it is by no means enough that a name should end in -ing, to convert it into a genuine patronymic. On the contrary it is a power of that termination to denote the genitive or possessive, which is also the generative case: and in some local names we do find it so used: thus Æðelwulfing lond [Cod. Dipl. No. 179, a. 801] is exactly equivalent to Æðelwulfes lond, the estate of a duke Æðelwulf, not of a family called Æðelwulfings. So again, dæt Folcwining lond [Cod. Dipl. No. 195, a. 811], dæt Wynhearding lond [Cod. Dipl. No. 195, a. 811], imply the land of Folcwine, of Wynheard, not of marks or families called Folcwinings, and Wynheardings. [Cf. Cāsering ✝ caseres gafel didrachma, Mt. Kmbl. Lind. 17, 24.] Woolbedington, Wool Lavington, Barlavington, are respectively Wulfbæding tūn, Wulflāfing tūn, Beorlāfing tūn, the tūn or dwelling of Wulflāf, Wulfbæd, and Beorlāf. Between such words and genuine patronymics the line must be carefully drawn, a task which requires both skill and experience; the best security is, where we find the patronymic in the genitive plural. . . . Changes for the sake of euphony must also be guarded against, as sources of error: thus Abingdon in Berks would impel us strongly to assume a family of Abingas; the Saxon name Æbban dūn convinces us that it was named from an Æbba [m.] or Æbbe [f.]. Dunnington is not Duning tūn, but Dunnan tūn.' Kemble's Saxons in England, i. 59, nn; see also the text in the following pages, and Taylor's Names and Places, pp. 82–3. 89. As was seen above in Adaming, the native suffix could be applied in the case of individuals to foreign names: it was so also in the case of peoples. Thus in the Rushworth Gloss, Mt. 8, 28, 'in lond gerensinga' translates in regionem Gerasenorum; in 10, 15 'eorde sodominga and gomorringa' is the rendering of terra Sodomorum et Gomorræorum, and above in v. 5 of the same chapter we have 'cæstra samaringa' for civitates samaritanorum. These may be compared with the forms in the Chronicle, West Kentingas, 999; Erl. 134, 28; East Centingas, 1009; Erl. 142, 19; Centingas, 1011; Erl. 144, 27. II. The suffix is also found in nouns formed from adjectives with a force which may be seen in the following examples:—ǽdeling a prince: earming a wretch.

ing the name of the nasal guttural ᛝ ng, in the Runic alphabet. In the Gothic the name seems to have been iggws, see Zacher, Das Gothische Alphabet, p. 3. In the Runic poem 22; Kmbl. 343, 27 it is taken as the name of a prince of the East Danes:—Ing wæs ǽrest mid Ēast Denum gesewen secgum; ōþ hē siððan eft ofer wǽg gewāt. Þus hēardingas ðone hæle nemdon. This name [cf. Gothic form] may be the same as that found in a genealogy in the Chronicle a. 547:—Esa wæs Inguing Ingui Angenwitting, Erl. 16, 11. As a proper name or as part of a proper name Ingi occurs in Icelandic, e. g. Ingi-björg, Ing-veldr, Ingi-mundr, Ingólfr: 'many more compounds are found in the Swedish-Runic stones as this name was national among the ancient Swedes; cf. also Yngvi and Ynglingar.' Cl. and Vig. Ingi. For the Rune see Zacher, pp. 30, 56–7: Taylor's Greeks and Goths, pp. 31, 82: and for the name Grmm. D. M. pp. 320–1.

K.

THE letter k appears to have had no distinct duty to perform in the oldest English, but to have been a mere variant of c. In the MSS. (more particularly the Cotton) of Alfred's translation of Gregory's Pastoral Care, where in the words kyning, kynn &c. it occurs not unfrequently, this writing is not uniform. Thus in Sweet's edition Angelkynn is found p. 2, ll. 3, 13, but Angelcynn l. 4; whilst in each case the Hatton MS. has c. So in the following page in l. 10, kynn, in l. 20, cynn. On pp. 2, 3, l. 1 kyning is the writing of both MSS. while pp. 34, 35, l. 14 it is cyning: p. 32, 20–1 we find kyning, kynehad, the Hatton MS. in the same passage has c: p. 38, ll. 13, 18 kyning, kynestol, where the Hatton MS. has cyning, kynestol: pp. 6, 7, l. 18 both have kynerice: p. 84, ll. 10, 12, 13 kynelic occurs four times, in the Hatton MS. it is twice written with c, twice with k. On p. 212, l. 15 is found Crist, while the Hatton writes Krist; on p. 152, line 5 the Cotton MS. has kræft, while the Hatton MS. craft. On p. 459, ll. 29, 31, 32 (Hatton MS.) occur the forms kokka, kokkum, kok. So in the Chronicle. Erl. p. 8, l. 15 kyning, but

p. 6, l. 23 cyning: p. 24, l. 1, kyning; 26, 1. cyning. The later use with regard to the letter may be, to some extent, illustrated from the concluding years. For many years previous to 1111 the form is cyng, in that year we have Kyng Henri; again until 1122 the opening line of each annual contains the phrase Cyng Henri, then until the end the spelling is k.

Words beginning with k are to be looked for under c.

In the later specimens of the West Saxon dialect those words in which the vowel a immediately preceded a combination of consonants beginning with l are generally found to have undergone a change which was represented by writing ea instead of a. This change does not occur to the same extent in the earlier specimens, and seems not to occur at all in the Northumbrian dialect, or in the kindred languages. Thus in the translation of Gregory's Pastoral Care and in the Parker MS. of the Chronicle alle, onwald are found as well as ealle, onweald, while in Ælfric's Homilies they are regularly written in the latter form. So the West Saxon forms, healdan, sealt, healf, are found in the Northumbrian Gospels as halda, salt, half, and in Gothic, O. Sax., Icel., O. H. Ger. the vowel also is a.

In the Runic alphabet the character, which in name and form agrees with the Scandinavian rune ᛚ, lögr, was ᛚ, lagu. The same name seems to have been given to the corresponding letter in the Gothic alphabet, though it occurs only in a corrupt form laar = lagus. The meaning of this word may be seen from the verses in the Runic poem that are devoted to the letter:

Lagu byþ leódum	water to wanderers
langsum geþuht	wearisome seemeth
gif hí sculun néþan	if they must venture
on nacan tealtum	on vessel unsteady
and hí sǽ́þa	and them the sea-waves
swýðe brégaþ	sorely affright
and se brimhengest	and the sea-horse
bridles ne gýmþ	steering despiseth.

lāc; generally neuter, but occasionally feminine [v. Shrn. pp. 3-4], or masculine, as in the compound lyb-lāc q. v. The idea which lies at the root of the various meanings of this and of the next word seems to be that of motion. Thus lācan and Icel. leika are used to describe the motion of a vessel riding on the waves, the flight of a bird as it rises and falls in the air, the flickering, wavering motion of flame, and the like; while Gothic laikan renders σκιρτᾶν in Luke i. 41, 44: vi. 23. From this idea of activity we pass to that of games, playing, dancing &c.; and so Gothic laiks = χορός in Luke xv. 25; in Icel., where the meaning play, sport is the prevailing one (see also compounds in which leik- occurs), leikr is used of dancing, athletics, various games, music, as in strengleikr, leika = to play, to lake in the dialect of the North of England. In O. H. Ger. the application is generally to music, leih, leich = modus, modulus, carmen versus, but in rang-leih = wrestling the meaning is similar to the Icelandic (see Grff. ii. 152–3.) And just as plega is used, by itself or in its compounds, of war and battle, so in the Icelandic poetry we have Hildar leikr, sverða leikr = battle (see Cl. and Vig. Dict. p. 382, col. 2), and in English lāc could be applied in the same way. But in the latter language the more frequent meanings are those of offering, gift, and to connect these with the preceding ones Grimm notes the association of dancing and playing with offerings and sacrifices. From this special meaning of offering the more general one of gift, present might easily come. To quote his words 'Das wort (lác) scheint einer wurzel mit dem goth. laiks (saltatio) ahd. leih (ludus, modus) altn. leikr, ursprünglich also tanz und spiel, die das opfer begleiteten, allmählich die gabe selbst zu bezeichnen,' D. lactuca, an; f. This word seems to retain its Latin form in the nominative, but otherwise conforms to English usage, and is generally treated as a weak noun. The form lactucas, however, occurs in the Leechdoms, which, though it looks like a strong plural masc., seems to be singular:—Lactuca hātte seó wyrt ðe hī etan sceoldon mid ðām þeorfum hlāfum heó is biter on þigene lettuce was the name of the herb that they were to eat with the unleavened loaves; it is bitter in the eating, Homl. Kmbl. i. 190, 6. Ad aquæ ripam laenlāde, 163, 16. Cappelād, Wodelād are other instances occurring in the Charters. III. carrying, carriage, bringing (see lǽdan):—Sunnandæges cýþinge wé forbeódaþ and ælc weorc and ælce lāde āgðer ge on wǽne ge on horse ge on byrdene we forbid Sunday traffic and all work and all carrying (of goods, &c.) both by waggon and by horse and by the man himself, L. N. P. L. 55; Th. ii. 298, 22. [The word lád in this passage can hardly be translated 'journeying;' for, in the first place, such a meaning does not well suit the phrase on byrdene, and, next, some journeying was allowed. Thus, L. E. I. 24; Th. ii. 420, 21–, it is said no secular work was to be done 'būtan hwam gebyrige dæt hē nýde faran scyle; ðonne mōt hē swā rīdan swā rōwan swā swilce færelde faran swylce tō his wege gebyrige.' The threefold division of the means of carriage seems to be that found in the Icelandic law where, dealing with the observance of Sunday, it is said of the amount that might be carried in journeying on that day 'er rētt at bera á sjálfum ser (= on byrdene) eþa fara á skipi eþa bera á hrossi.'] On sumon hē sceal lāde lǽdan on some lands the 'geneat' has to furnish means of carriage, L. R. S. 2; Th. i. 432, 14. Cf. 436, 5–6:—Hē sceal beón gehorsad dæt hē mæge tō hlāfordes seáme dæt syllan oððe sylf lǽdan. The word used in both cases in the Latin translation is summagium, in reference to which, and to the English words which it translates, may be quoted Thorpe's explanation in his glossary: 'Lád, seám, summagium. A service, which consisted in supplying the lord with beasts of burthen, or, as defined by Roquefort (voce somey): "Service qu'un vassal devoit à son seigneur, et qui consistoit à faire faire quelques voyages par ses bêtes de somme." See Spelman sub voce, and Du Cange voce Sagma.' The phrase lāde lǽdan occurs in a similar passage, dealing with the duties of the 'geneát,' in Cod. Dip. Kmbl. iii. 450, 31–:—Se geneát [at Dyddanham] sceal wyrcan swā on lande, swā of lande, hweder swā man bỹt and rīdan, and auerian, and lāde lǽdan, drāfe drīfan, and fela ōðra þinga dōn. The later English lode seems to keep this meaning. Thus Prompt. Parv. 310, lode or caryage vectura; lodysmanne vector, lator, vehicularius: the verb lead is found with the sense of carry, e g. p. 62 cartyn or lede wythe a carte; and in the note, and again in a note on p. 293, we have the phrases 'to lede dong,' 'to lede wheet,' &c. See also scip-lād. IV. Sustenance, provision, means of subsistence:—Ne sceal se dryhtnes þeów in his mōdsefan māre gelufian eorþan ēhtwelan ðonne his ānes gemet dæt hē his līchoman lāde hæbbe nor shall the servant of the Lord love more of earth's possessions, than a sufficiency for himself, that he may have sustenance for his body, Exon. 38 a; Th. 125, 27; Gū. 360. With this use of lād may be compared the later English lif-lode which, besides the meaning conduct, has that of sustenance:—Heo tilede here lyflode . . . heo fonden hem sustynance ynow, R. Glouc. 41, 22: Prompt. Parv. lyvelode victus; lyflode or warysone donativum. So O. H. Ger. lîb-leita victus, annona, alimonium. Dætte hē nāne lāde ne mæge findan ac sīe sūa mid his āgnum wordum gebunden et in nulla sui defensione se exerceat, quam sententia proprii oris ligat. Past. 26, 3; Swt. 185, 16. Homl. 57, 20. II. as a technical term in the laws, purgation, exculpation, the clearing one's self from a charge or accusation. The accused might clear himself by his own oath, supported by the oaths of a certain number of compurgators, or he might undergo some form of ordeal. The lād varied with the character of the deed with the commission of which the accused was charged. In the ánfeald lād, if the purgation were by oath, the oaths of the accused, and two others were necessary, in the þrýfeald lād, the accused was to bring five compurgators; if the ordeal was used, in the former case the iron weighed one pound, in the latter, three. Other passages than those cited below, which may illustrate the terms ánfeald, þrýfeald, are the following:—Wē cwǽdon be ðām morþslyhtum dæt man dỹpte ðone āþ be þrýfealdum and myclade dæt ordālīsen dæt hit gewege þrý pund, L. The term 'lād,' it will be seen from the following passages, does not, as Schmid observes, occur in the laws before Ethelred's time, canne and andsæc being used previously:—Gyf mon ðone hlāford teó . . . nime him fīf þegnas tō and beó him sylf syxta and lādie hine ðæs. And gif seó lād forþcume beó hē dæs were wyrðe *if the lord be accused . . . let him take to himself five thanes, and be himself the sixth, and clear himself of the charge. Ethb. 7; Th. i. 4, 8. The word, as Schmid observes, might have the same meaning as lád-mann q. v. just as Layamon uses the compound lod-cniht, 'biforen rad heore lod-cnihte' 25730; or taking lád in the sense of journey the reference may be to a messenger of the king. cf. L. In. 33; Th. i. 122, 13 where it speaks of 'Cyninges horswealh se de him mæge geǽrendian.' But there is another use of láð [v. lád, III) which perhaps is that in the passage; then the lád-rinc would be the king's carrier, one who did for the king similar service to that which the geneát does for his lord. In the Prompt. Parv. lody-manne is rendered by vector, lator, vehicularius.

Parv. 291, where the following note is given. 'Forty threads of hemp-yarn are termed in Norfolk a lea. The "lea" by which linen yarn was estimated at Kidderminster, contained 200 threads.' Halliwell gives as a northern word 'lea the seventh part of a hank or skein of worsted.'

lǽc a gift. v. lác.

lǽc; adj. The word, if this be the true form of it, occurs only once, in the following passage:—Gárulf gecrang ealra ǽrest . . . ymb hyne gódra fela hwearf lacra hrár hræfn wandrode sweart and sealobrún, Fins. Th. 64-70; Fin. 33-5. All the editors for hrær, which Hickes gives, read hráw, but in the MSS. r (ƿ) and s (ſ) are so nearly alike that perhaps hrás, the genitive of hrá, was the original word. With regard to lacra various explanations have been given. Kemble and Conybeare print hwearflacra, Ettmüller reads hwearflícra, Thorpe hwearf láðra, Grein hwearf lacra. Taking the word to be independent, and retaining the reading of Hickes, we may compare it with Icel. lakr lacking, defective, and render it by weak, failing (from wounds), wounded. Another form that attracts comparison is given by Graff ii. 100, lah, which has reference to cutting, and this suggests the rendering wounded. With the reading hrás for hrær the passage might be translated 'first of all sank down Garulf . . . around him moved many a stout man weak or wounded in body: the raven wheeled round swart and dusky.' Ettmüller p. xxiv, giving a meaning to wandrian which it will hardly bear, translates the doubtful part of the passage 'volubilium (=mortuorum) cadavera corvus conculcavit.' Similarly, as regards the first part, Conybeare has 'circa illum fortes multi caduci moriebantur.' lǽrest, least :—Æt ðam lærestan whitewamme iii scillingas and at ðam māran vi scill. for the smallest disfigurement of the face iii shillings, for the greater vi shillings, L. Ethb. 56; Th. i. 16, 15. As this seems to be the only instance in which this form occurs, Schmid suggests that r is wrongly written for s, but the O. Frs. lerest may justify the presence of the r. v. læssa.

-lǽred. v. ge-, sam-, þurh-, un-lǽred.

lǽrestre, an; f. A female teacher, an instructress, preceptress :—Lǽrestre doctrix, Ælfc. Gr. 9, 64; Zup. 71, 8. Siddan clypode heó hire tō ða ylcan lǽrestran, Homl. Th. ii. 543, 8. lǽr-gedēfe :—Leorna lāre lǽr gedēfe wene dec in wisdōm. Exon. 80ó; Th. 303, 31; Fä. 61. In this passage Etmüller and Grein take lǽrgedēfe as an adj. but lǽr may well be, as Thorpe takes it, the imperat. of lǽran, which verb naturally accompanies leornian.

lǽrig. A word of doubtful meaning occurring only twice :—Bærst bordes lǽrig, Byrht. Th. 140, 6; By. 284. Ne him bealubenne gebiden hæfdon ofer linde lǽrig. Cd. 154; Th. 192, 29; Exod. 239. Grein suggests comparison with λαισήϊον a buckler, target, and that the word like rand may mean the rim of the shield and also the body of the shield. Either rendering is admissible so far as the sense is concerned.

lǽring, e; f. Instruction, teaching [see next two words and Icel. læring teaching, learning: O. H. Ger. lērunga institutio, doctrina.]

lǽring-mǽden, es; n. A girl who is receiving instruction, a female pupil :—Nim nū lāreów and bryng ðīnum lǽringcmǽdene take now, master, and bring them to thy pupil, Th. Ap. 20, 13. [Cf. Icel. læri-mær a female disciple.]

-lǽta. v. freó-, frig-, scyld-lǽta.

LǼTAN, p. lēt, leórt; pp. lǽten. The ellipsis of a verb in the infinitive, the meaning of which may be inferred from the context, not unfrequently takes place after lǽtan; and the connection of many of the meanings which follow with the simple one seems explainable in this way. I. to LET, allow, permit, suffer:—God lēt him fyrst dǽt hé his mándǽda geswíce God allows him time that he may cease from his crimes, Homl. S. 1; Th. i. 376, 7. In the phrases on Engla, Dena, &c. lage, which may be compared with the Icel. í þrænda lögum, lagu is nearly equivalent to 'district in which certain [English, Danish, &c.] laws prevail,' and in Cl. & V. Dict. [v. lög ii.] lög is rendered 'law community, commmion, also a law district.' So in L. E. G. 7; Th. i. 172, 3 it is said:—Gif hlâford his þeówan freólsdæge nýde tô weorce gylde lahslîtte inne on Deone lage and wîte mid Englum. These laws are the first in which lagu or lah- occurs, afterwards these forms are not unfrequent, and are continued in the Laws of William the Conqueror 'en Dene lahe, en Merchene lahe, en West Sexene lahe.' Th. i. 466, and in L. H. I. 'in Denelaga,' 566. From the time of the appearance of the word it would seem that its use was due to Scandinavian influence. v. Steenstrup's Normannerne, iv. 15 sqq. In Icelandic the word is used in the sense of law only in pl. lög: Dan. lov. v. land-, mæg-, riht-, þegen-, un-, woruld- lagu; laga and lah.

M

Original m, generally speaking, is preserved in Anglo-Saxon, and is found corresponding to m in the Gothic and other cognate dialects, e. g. mê, manna, dôm; Goth. mik, manna, dôms. When, however, m is not initial, the correspondence is not always maintained; thus, A.S. fîf, but Goth. fimf; A.S. sôfte, O.H.Ger. samfto. Also for earlier fn is found mn, as in emn along with efn, Goth. ibn; stemn and stefn, Goth. stibna. In some inflexions m is no longer found; so in the 1st pers. sing. pres. indic. eom is the only instance in which the old person-ending has maintained itself; though beón, dôn, and gân offer occasional instances of its retention in the Northern Gospels; while the m which is found in the plural of the Gothic and O. H. Ger. conjugations has left no trace. In declensions n in the later times began to take the place of m in the dative, so ðan for ðam.

The form of the Runic letter, whose name was man, was ᛗ, but from the similarity to the d-rune (dæg) ᛞ, the two seem to be sometimes confounded. In each case the symbol was sometimes employed, after the runes had been generally supplanted by the Latin letters, to express the word which was its name; thus in the Durham Ritual quis is glossed ænig ᛗ, nemo, ne ænig ᛗ: the same symbol being also used to gloss dies. The form of the rune accompanying the Runic poem is ᛗ, Kmbl. plate 16, fig. 11, and the verse attached to it the following:—

Man byþ on myrgþe	Men will be cheerful,
his mâgan leóf	dear to their friends,
sceal deáh ânra gehwyle	shall yet each one
ôðrum swîcan	depart from other, fordam dryhten wile	for the Lord will
dôme sînum	by his doom
dæt earme flæsc	the 'vile body'
eorþan betæcan.	commit to earth.

metod, metud, meotud, meotod, es; m. A word found only in poetry (the phrase se metoda drihten occurs twice in Ælfric's Homilies, but in alliterative passages). The earlier meaning of the word in heathen times may have been fate, destiny, death (cf. metan), by which Grein would translate metod in Wald. 1, 34; Val. 1, 19:—Ðý ic dē metod ondrēd ðæt ðū tō fyrenlīce feohtan sōhtest (Stephens here takes metod as vocative with the meaning of prince); in this sense it seems to be used in its compounds, and in the Icelandic mjötuðr weird, bane, death (Cl. and Vig. mjötuðr, II). Could this be the meaning in the phrase se metoda drihten used of Christ in the following passages?—Ne dorston ða deófiu, ða ðā hī ādrǽfde wǽron, intō ðām swȳnum, gif hē him ne sealde leáfe, ne intō nānum men forðan se metoda drihten ūre gecynd hæfde on him sylfum genumen, Homl. Th. ii. 380, 4–7. Gemyndig on mōde hū se metoda drihten ewæþ on his godspelle be his godcundan tōcyme, 512, 27. But the word, which occurs frequently, is generally an epithet of the Deity as the O. Sax. metod; so too Icel. mjötuðr (Cl. and Vig. mjötuðr, I) is applied to heathen gods:—Metod engla, lífes brytta, Cd. 6; Th. 8, 9; Gen. 136. Blīdheort cyning, metod alwihta monna cynnes, 10; Th. 12, 29; Gen. 193. Hine forwræc metod manc ynne fram, Beo. Th. 220; B. 110. Metud O Lord! Elen. Kmbl. 1634; El. 819. N.

N, like m (q. v.), in Anglo-Saxon generally corresponds to n in Gothic and in other cognate dialects, e. g. net, hand, ân; Goth. nati, handus, ains; O. H. Ger. nezzi, hant, ein; O. Sax. net, hand, ên; but, like m, it falls away before ð and s, and the vowel which preceded the n is lengthened, e. g. cûð, tôð, ôðer, mûð, hûsel, est; Goth. kunþs, tunþus, anþar, munþs, hunsl, ansts; O. H. Ger. chund, zand, andar, mund, anst; O. Sax. kûð, tand, ôðar, mûð, anst. If, however, n and s come together by the loss of an intervening vowel the n remains, e. g. winstre; O. H. Ger. O. Sax. winistar. The character which appears in the Runic poem is ᚾ, and the verse, in which the name (cf. Icel. naud) is given, is the following:—

Nýd byþ nearu on breóste — oft tó helpe níða bearnum, — and tó hǽle gehwǽdre weorðeþ heó ðeáh — gif hí his hlystaþ ǽror.
Runic pm. Kmbl. 341, 8–13.
